The protein is produced predominantly by fibroblast cells, and is initially synthesized as a single polypeptide (preproIGF-II, 93 amino acids) containing six tandem repeated domains (domains A-F), followed by proteolytic cleavage to produce the mature protein, a mature single-chain polypeptide with 89 amino acids. The mature IGF-II protein has significant homology to the insulin molecule and acts as a potent mitogenic and insulin-like activity. Because of the mitogenic nature of IGF-II, it has been isolated

I have many classes and interfaces which are exactly the same in functionality and a lot of the code is identical. I want to write a template to extract functions for a particular type so I don't have to write the same code again. Something like this: template T getVal(const string &key, T def) { // This is where the magic happens return def; } class A { public: int a; }; class B { public: int b; }; int main() { int b = getVal("a", 3); int b = getVal("b", 3); } Is it possible to define a template to do the magic above? A: One problem, however, is that getVal will be defined in terms of the type itself, not an instance of the type, so you'll get an error: int getVal("a", 3); You could work around this by using a trick: template class getVal ba244e880a
