I think I'm getting a little confused with this, but I'm seeing this pattern all over (If I understand it correctly, currying means that you make the functions callable with a numeric parameter like: function add(a, b) { return a + b; } add(1, 2); Becomes: function add(a) { return function(b) { return a + b; }; } add(1); But then I'm not sure what the benefit is, because the call to add is the same.

Could someone help me understand this better?

A: Suppose we have a function like this:

function f(a, b, c) { console.log(a + b + c); }

There are 3 parameters, but we don't want to write them out. Instead, we'd like to say `f(2, 4, 5)`; or even `f(2, 4)(5)`; If the parameters were not curried, then there would be no way of doing this: `f(2, 4, 5)` wouldn't be a function, because it would expect 3 arguments rather than 2. By letting them be curried, we can write
