Amplifying the placebo response in drug trials: the importance of non-pharmacological effects in drug development. The average magnitude of a placebo effect is approximately 30% in drug development, but it is uncertain how this magnitude might be increased by enhanced biasing strategies. One approach involves enhancing non-pharmacological effects of a placebo treatment, which could increase the number of subjects responding to the placebo treatment. The present meta-analysis investigated whether enhancing placebo effects by enhancing non-pharmacological effects of a placebo treatment would increase the placebo effect. Effects of non-pharmacological characteristics of placebo treatments on placebo responses were evaluated by systematically reviewing published placebo treatment studies of clinical trials, supplemented by unpublished data. Meta-regression analyses were performed to investigate the associations of non-pharmacological characteristics of placebo treatments with placebo responses in clinical trials. Of the 23 included studies, 23 different non-pharmacological characteristics of placebo treatments were identified. The characteristics that were associated with the largest placebo responses were the expectancy of effects (mean weighted correlation = 0.66), historical controls (0.64), spontaneous pain history (0
