But who would be able to benefit from this land? Under existing Australian law, 80% of Australian-owned land in Antarctica must be claimed, under treaty to prevent adverse impacts on Antarctica. But who would be able to benefit from this land? It is likely that such land would be claimed by Aboriginal peoples for their use, but the pastoral, mining and forestry industries are also potential beneficiaries. However, any claim by Indigenous people would undoubtedly involve them in a long and hard fight against an industry that is not interested in voluntary co-operation. The industry could only gain from this claim by preventing the Aboriginal peoples' use. That they would be likely be forced to if they tried to block their access to land would give rise to the question of whether their rights to land were as important as those of the new 'owners'. Indigenous people could not have veto on what happened on their land. If the new owners had the right to use the land, this would of course place Indigenous people in a very tough bargaining position. They would effectively have to agree to the new owners carrying out development that they did not want. They could reject the new owners and try to claim the land, but that would cause them many other problems. On the other hand, with the development of the land, there would be a need to divert large amounts of water into Antarctic rivers. This would be a considerable problem for Western Australia, which produces much of the nation's fresh water. The new owners would be affected by their decisions. For example, any mining project on the land would generate vast amounts of toxic waste and chemical run-off into the soil and into surrounding water. And the owners would not want to leave the waste there for the free disposal of any old metal that they turned up. However, if the land wasn't owned by the emerging commercial interest, it would be left as a park for scientific exploration, with the company obligated to pay the Australian
