With a bit of training and practice, there is nothing that can harm your eyes. As long as you are aware of the dangers, you can avoid most of the trouble. Iris Crack ...In today's Washington Post, Chris Cillizza and Caren Bohan report that congressional Democrats will unveil a resolution aimed at repealing or restructuring the Independent Payment Advisory Board. Cillizza writes: The proposal is expected to include the repeal of the IPAB, an effort to block Medicare cuts to doctors and hospitals and a call for a Medicare premium support plan. Democrats also are expected to look at tying the defense budget to reducing the deficit. They're also expected to reexamine whether the Department of Veterans Affairs, which is still in turmoil from an investigation into its treatment of veterans, should be converted to a system of block grants for its health care services. As we've discussed previously, President Obama and Senate Republicans together put together a bill in January 2013 that included a repeal of the Independent Payment Advisory Board that was slated to come into play under Obamacare. Republicans have repeatedly argued that if their effort to repeal the board succeeded, then, as they said then, "Obamacare is a loser." Now, they're about to make good on their argument. I'm not sure that the public supports repeal of the IPAB. Repealing the board's rule, which was first proposed in 2009, was a non-starter. Even the New York Times called it, "The most hated part of the Affordable Care Act." But Democrats don't think that the American public will support raising Medicare's "prospective payment system" cuts to doctors and hospitals. So, they're trying to come up with a different legislative solution. Pursuant to the Affordable Care Act, a board (also known as an independent agency) is tasked with making cuts to Medicare if the Medicare panel forecasts that the program's spending will exceed its projected revenues. The board's actual power is limited to putting pressure on Medicare to adopt
