On a moonless night, the waning gibbous moon is the perfect time to shine, and many people have been doing just that—shining a light. By the time moonlight is dimmed, it's time to sleep. That's why many of us feel “sleepy” in the late afternoon, after the moon rises in the sky. The questions we're asking and the concerns that arise are real and valid. We've all thought about whether it's safe or not to shine a light out into the night sky, even on a moonless night. This idea first came to my attention when my friend, Charles Kiefer, wrote a review of F.A. Hayek's book, The Use of Knowledge in Society. He quoted Hayek's words, which I'll repeat here: “I know of no better argument for doing without central planning than the light shining into the night sky in the absence of artificial illumination.” It took me a while to gain a full understanding of what Hayek was trying to tell us. But ultimately, I realized that Hayek was not talking about the danger of light shining into the night sky, but the danger of regulation of businesses, which would allow the
