The company's application is based around a proprietary algorithm that serves up a unique, personalized listening experience as a way to help people find podcasts that they'll enjoy. While the application at launch supports more than a hundred different podcasts, the current iteration of the app is optimized for shows centered around political satire. It's a format that has certainly been popular amongst millennial podcast fans in recent months, and will likely be preferred by a subset of the core Darwin user base. Beyond helping Darwin users discover new podcasts, it's one of the company's stated goals to connect them with their friends and relevant audience, helping it build a true community around podcasts. More specifically, the company says that it aims to help people make connections through

"discovery," "share-ability," and "friendzability" The company notes that since it was founded, it has already enabled people to form friendships based around political podcasts that they love, and that this "demonstrates the value of having conversations that don't end with
