If you have a job to do you should do your best and leave the rest to your own self discovery. It's like having a room at a hotel and listening to your own music in your room. If you want to go out in the dining area or in the hall, that is more difficult because you are occupying space. ~~~ elorant You can do what you want, but you have to do what you have to do. I find my career to be some times like that, I'm a very good developer but I don't really have that much in common with other developers, so I almost feel like I need to do my own thing whenever I'm able to. ----- joesmo Networking? More like filtering. A savvy group of average to above average people will get great talent. If you try to do networking, you will find that your average will sink, and you will have to make the pivot so you don't. But if you limit yourself to just the top of the talent pool, you will be competent. And if you're making sure that those people are good people, you will usually have people helping and/or working alongside of you, so you'll likely do just fine. If networking is really the problem, then a country with smaller cities, towns, villages, and places would be more desirable than modern-day America. You'll find more local people, will probably get better coverage, and relationships will be relatively easier to forge. Of course, culture is also important, but that's still a small cost compared to a big country with cities. ~~~
