There is much interest in developing gene therapies for treating hemochromatosis.

Administration of human serum albumin (HSA), an endogenous plasma protein, could serve as an ideal, safe, biocompatible vehicle for delivering therapeutic genes. We have tested the feasibility of using HSA to provide a suitable targeted therapeutic gene delivery vehicle. We constructed an HSA-transferrin (HSA-TF) fusion protein that had human transferrin (TF) bound to the protein and human albumin (HSA) fused to the C-terminus. The HSA-TF fusion protein was efficiently taken up by cells expressing transferrin receptor (TfR) and internalized to the cell lysosomes. We then tested the HSA-TF protein in hepcidin-mediated reduction of iron loading in mice (Alb^{+/+}TfR mice; gene for TF, +, or HSA-TF gene, + and -) at various doses of administration. The F2 mice of Alb^{+/+}TfR mice treated with HSA-TF, but not Alb^{+/+}TfR mice treated with HSA, showed significant reduction in serum iron and liver iron and a concomitant increase in transferrin saturation. However, when Alb^{+/+}TfR mice
