On boxes that can be updated via a specific serial number,.Evaluation of a perfusion model and micropuncture techniques to estimate the hydraulic conductivity of the proximal tubule. Renal ultrafiltration can be measured by either micropuncture or by perfusion at high rates. We evaluated a perfusion model and micropuncture techniques to determine the hydraulic conductivity (Lp), renal plasma flow (RPF), total water reabsorption, and osmolar clearance of the proximal tubule and the effect of anoxia on these variables. The rate of ultrafiltration and the Tp eff (tonicity in the early segment of the proximal tubule) were measured by micropuncture in the unanaesthetised dog. In separate perfusion studies the Lp of the proximal tubule was determined from the clearance of mannitol, galactose, sucrose, and H2O. Tp eff and the fractional clearance of each substance were comparable to values previously measured. Perfusion studies showed that Lp did not vary with Tp eff, osmolality, or the concentration of the solute. Lp determined by micropuncture showed a 4-fold increase during the first two hours of anoxia, and returned to control values after 45 min. Micropuncture is a feasible method for determination of the Lp of
